Not illustrated. 1843 edition. Excerpt: ... gallop. With all the brats, a tidy load. And perhaps a neighbours child to fill up. At Farringdon and Common Garden, Im fairly laid upon the shelf; My only chance to earn a farden, Is truckling to the truck myself. But well resist this horrid plot. And for our order boldly strive, For this I know, that ours are not The only ill-used dogs alive. Lets not be down upon our luck, Nor out of heart at our condition, And since our dogs cant draw a truck, At least well draw up a petition, And lay our case before the Commons, What keeps the money of the nation: Perchance well get, like other rum una, An equitable compensation. Ordered to be considered below. BARBER COX AND THE CUTTING/OFF HIS COMB. JANUARY.--The Announcement. On the 1st of January, 1838, I was the master of a lovely shop in the neighbourhood of Oxford market; of a wife, Mrs. Cox; of a business, both in the shaving and cutting line, established three-and-thirty years; of a girl and boy respectively of the ages of eighteen and thirteen; of a three-windowed front, both to ray first and second pair; of a young foreman, my present partner, Mr. Orlando Crump; and of that celebrated mixture for the human hair, invented by my late uncle, and called Coxs Bohemian Balsam of Tokay, sold in pots at two-and-three, and three-and-nme; the balsam, the lodgings, and the old-established cutting and shaving business, brought me in a pretty genteel income. I had had my girl, Jemimarann, at Hackney, to school; my dear boy, Tuggeridge, plaited hair already beautifully; my wife at the counter (behind the tray of patent soaps, &c) cut as handsome a figure as possible; and it was my hope that Orlando and my girl, who were mighty soft upon one another, would, one day, be joined together in...
