Now let any one 95 Whose soul magnanimous to stand the fight Singly with me, impels him, hither come, In presence of you all, to Hectors strength Opposd in arms! But this I now propose: (Be mighty Jove a witness for us both,) 100 If he shall slay me with his brazen lance, Let him possess my armor as his prize, And bear it to the navy, but restore My breathless body, home to be conveyed, That Trojan men and Trojan dames may give 105 The portion of the dead, a funeral fire. And, with Apollos aid, if him I slay, His armor I will bear to sacred Troy, And there suspend it, as an offering due To Phosbus splendid shrine; but to the fleet 110 His corpse I will relinquish, that the Greeks May there perform exequial rites, and raise A mound of earth, memorial of the dead, Upon the shore of wide-spread Hellespont. Hereafter, mariners of other timesf 115 From ours remote, as in their well-oared bark They plough the dark-blue waves, may say, Behold A warriors tomb, who fell in ages past, By glorious Hector slain, with him in fight L/-i. (C/ Boldly contending! Such will be the tale Hereafter, and my fame shall never die! He spoke, and all the Greeks amazd, remaind In silence wrappd, unwilling to refuse That challenge fierce, yet dreading to accept. At length the Spartan monarch, stung with shame, 125 And groaning from his inmost soul arose And thus indignant cried:--O boasters vain! Women of Greece, for ye of men the name No longer merit! Ah! what dire disgrace, What shame unutterable would be ours, 130 If no one of Achaias host would meet Hector in combat! But ye cowards vile, A heartless race, inglorious here may sit Till earth and water ye again become, While I against that boastful chief will arm. 135...
